The beauty of India is that the ancient and traditional co-exists with the modern; and no matter how far into the future the nation advances, it is almost impossible to turn off the tap from which its past flows. The Serendipity Arts Foundation was set up to nourish and strengthen India’s rich and diverse cultural roots and connect its rich heritage to the present to create a brighter future.

The Foundation’s annual Serendipity Arts Festival is an interdisciplinary curated arts festival that promotes craftsmen & women, artists, and performing artists in an environment of increasing accessibility and inclusiveness. It also challenges traditional boundaries and redefines engagement with the arts.

Over eight days, India’s visual, performing, performance and culinary arts are featured in a relevant and contemporary setting along the Mandovi river in Panaji, Goa, with five distinct aims: to revive India’s traditional skills and crafts, to enhance the abilities of artisans, artists and traditional performers, to garner institutional support and private patronage, and to enhance India’s soft power by exposing lots of people to this extravaganza, especially the young.

This novel philanthropic and social responsibility project showcases the skill, diversity and interdisciplinary on a scale rarely seen in any country before. In two editions, it has brought together more than 1300 artists and artisans for 120 projects across seven disciplines of art and culture, resulting in a footfall of over 400,000.

In a very short period, the festival has become an important driver for arts education and cultural revival through collaborations between organizations, artists, and audiences. It has started conversations, bridged boundaries, and initiated collaborations between artists, private patrons and institutions.

Over eight days, the Festival allows people and Institutions to give of themselves and companies to build brand equity at India’s most popular holiday destination, during the high season in Goa. Beyond the festival, and beyond Goa— Serendipity Arts Foundation provides opportunities to companies to support Indian art and culture on a sustainable basis. The Foundation works with school children, including the girl child, street children, and emerging and acknowledged artists from across South Asia.

It also organizes exchange programs and residential programs aimed at skill development and livelihood enhancement—and welcomes exchange, partnerships and support in each of these areas. Ours is the outcome of contributions and tireless work of many institutions and individuals whose aim is to build a vehicle on which the arts can move forward in India. We also hope this this effort acts as a springboard for others to act, and keep the spark of culture alive.

Serendipity Arts Festival

The second edition of Serendipity Arts Festival, held between 15-22 December, 2017, was a curated multidisciplinary art event spanning the visual, performing and culinary arts. Spread across 10 venues in Panaji, Goa, the Festival consisted of an exciting, intensive programme of exhibitions and performances, which were augmented by spaces for social and educational engagement. Curated by a panel of eminent artists and institutional figures, the Festival programming was more than just a showcase of great Indian art. Instead, the Festival was a step forward in a longer-term cultural experiment that hopes to affect the way Indians interact with art on a daily basis, by addressing issues such as patronage culture, art accessibility, innovation in the arts, and interdisciplinary discourse, with a special focus on the South Asian subcontinent.

Music

Moving away from purely traditional musical performances, the Festival’s music curators – Shubha Mudgal and Ranjit Barot – explored innovations in music using technological interventions and a myriad of genres and styles. Ranjit Barot showcased national and international excellence through different forms of music, looking at the influence of jazz through A Night in Harlem. Fusion bands such as Shadow and Light and YouTube stars who have a massive online following but have rarely performed on the big stage were also featured. In addition to this, following the success of Baithaks and River Raga from 2016, these programmes were repeated to great appreciation.

The Sonic City installation, conceptualized and curated by Shubha Mudgal, is designed to be an experiential journey through the aural landscape of contemporary Delhi, replete with both the cacophony as well as the profound beauty of music and natural sounds. The helix-like structure of the installation, designed by eminent scenographer Sumant Jayakrishnan, is shaped like the inner rim of a human ear, and creates a pathway for visitors to traverse and experience sounds that have been recorded in Delhi, and music by artists who have made the city their home. The installation brings together multiple disciplines, from music and photography, to interactive technology and new media, as designed by collaborator Himanshu Bablani.

The installation showcases the integral diversity of life in India, and tells many stories, some that are immediately apparent, and others that may reveal themselves only to the most patient viewer. Interacting with the anarchic, cacophonous kaleidoscope of sounds at the centre of Sonic City, listeners and visitors are invited to filter out the sounds, sights, and emotions that they most identify with.

The sheer joy of rhythm brings participants closer to themselves, allowing a freedom of unbridled expression.

Drum Circle

Conducted by Taal Inc
We create music when we are happy. We create music when we are sad. We make music to accompany work. We make music for relaxation. There is music that brings entire communities together. There is music that only the truly sophisticated aficionado can appreciate in all its subtleties. There is no feeling that music cannot convey. There is music for every occasion. Including protest and resistance.

This sound, graphic and animation installation presents music of protest, resistance and social engagement over the last 80 or so years. People’s Music showcases material from different languages and regional contexts on everyday concerns of livelihoods, work, hunger, strife, war and conflict.

From Ravi Shankar’s moving music for the 1946 film Dharti ke Laal (the only film produced by the Indian People’s Theatre Association), to Makhdoom Mohiuddin’s soulful anti-war song; from songs of Bangladesh’s Bhasha Andolan (Language Movement) to Iqbal Bano’s stirring rendition of Faiz Ahmed Faiz’s Hum Dekhenge; from Paul Robeson’s magisterial Ol’ Man River to Sambhaji Bhagat’s foot-tapping Lafda Kai Ko Re, People’s Music is an experience to enjoy and be inspired by.
Theatre

Keeping the ethos of the Festival in mind, the theatre section of SAF 2017 aimed to transcend boundaries in theatrical practices and engagement, in order to create a unique experience for visitors. Curated by Lillete Dubey and Anuradha Kapur, this year’s programming, apart from bringing acclaimed Indian theatre performances to the festival, looked at physical, urban popular and experimental forms of theatre which questioned traditional notions of site, context, spectatorship and audience participation.

Further, visitors had a chance to view young theatre shows, that focused on innovation like Faezeh Jalali’s Shikhandi and Tushar Pandey’s Dumb Wait-err, along with unique performances by experienced theatre practitioners such as Maya Rao’s Quality Street and Neelam Mansingh Chowdhry’s Dark Borders.

Bandish is the story of two performers, one a nautanki singer, the other a baithak singer. Both performers relive their past days of glory and adventure with witty anecdotes of escapes from palaces, being kidnapped by the local landowners, refuting lovelorn aristocrats and being duped by charming and conniving men in the name of love and marriage. Traversing through nostalgia can be tricky, as memories of the past are a combination of how it actually happened and how it should have happened. The lives of the two singers are not only lessons in history, but life as well. The play is accompanied with a riveting score by Shubha Mudgal.
Combining craft, music, magic, puppetry and extraordinary make-up and costumes, Surabhi Theatre plays represent a unique facet of India’s theatrical traditions. Maya Bazar (‘Market of Illusions’) is regarded as the masterpiece of Sri Venkateswara Natyamandali (Surabhi Theatre). This production narrates the love story of Sesirekha, (the daughter of Balarama) and Abhimanyu (the son of Subhadra).

Maya Bazar

Director Rekandar Nageswar Rao (Babji)
Muktidham

Director Abhishek Majumdar
First commissioned by India Foundation for the Arts

Noted playwright and director Abhishek Majumdar’s latest production is the intellectual powerhouse, Muktidham. Tracing back to a period where Hindus were a minority in the country, the fictionalised piece based on historical evidence is set against the backdrop of a ‘Matha’ (Hindu monastery), in a fictional town called Beerpur. The eighth century was a time when the Pala Empire ruled the East of India and mass conversions to Buddhism were on the rise. Majumdar tries to dissect why all of the fascist movements eventually became anti-intellectual, especially focusing on the right wing movement.
A comic, tongue-in-cheek retelling of the story of Shikhandi from the Mahabharata, directed by Faezeh Jalali, mixes the traditional with the contemporary, questioning maleness, femaleness and everything in between. Shikhandi is perhaps one of the earliest trans-characters from Indian mythology. Shikhandi was meant to be born male to avenge an insult in her past life as Amba. But a bigger karmic game unfolds when she is reborn female, raised male, has a sex change (thanks to a yaksha) on her wedding night when she finally fulfills her destiny – to be the cause of Bhishma’s death.
Site Matters

Conducted by Jane Collins and Firos Khan

'Site Matters' was a three-day workshop guided by Jane Collins and Firos Khan. A group of 20 students considered how a performance might be conceived in response to a specific site in or around the environs of the Festival. The emphasis was not on producing finished works, but more about making short, speculative performance experiments generating further ideas for discussion. The workshop ended with a post-presentation seminar.
Critically acclaimed director Neelam Mansingh Chowdhry’s production Dark Borders is a performance of free-flowing embodied texts based on translations of Saadat Hasan Manto. The play explores the devastation brought upon women and families during times of migration, loss and devastation. These are the lives of forgotten people, those who exist on the margins of society.
This workshop focuses on the work of Rudolph Laban who created a movement vocabulary that can be articulated and hence executed with a deeper understanding of one's body and of human movement. It can be applied both to text and in physical storytelling. With Laban’s work, an actor/dancer/mover can break down a movement into its component parts for cleaner and more precise execution. Participants use ‘continuums’ and ‘efforts’, and apply them to the voice and body to create, explore and discover, characters and scenes in-depth and with precision.
Dance Like a Mother

Conducted by Accelerated Intimacy

(Initial version of DLAM supported by QueerInk and Ivo Theatre)

Dance Like A Mother, a workshop-performance exploring the ways in which we are becoming our parents, or versions of them through spontaneous dancing, memories and drag.
Dumb Wait-err

Directed by Tushar Pandey
Collaborators Samagra, Push and Pull

This production is an interpretation of Harold Pinter’s The Dumb Waiter, adapted to Hindi by theatre person Tushar Pandey and performed in an experimental manner. Including elements such as video and CCTV cameras, this show challenges traditional notions of spectatorship in theatre and brings ideas such as voyeurism to the fore.
Quality Street, based on the story by Nigerian writer Chimamanda Adichie, is about a mother and her daughter. Set in Lagos, Nigeria, with a few details changed, this story can be transposed to several cities across the world. The entire story is a non-stop, verbal ‘boxing match’ between mother and daughter, funny, yet deeply moving. At a deeper level the story looks at issues that lie at the core of people’s lives—of culture, values and relationships within a family.

This is a solo performance, where the events are seen through the eyes of the mother, Mrs. Njoku. The show is a salute to all mothers (and fathers) who strive to put up with their children, often against very heavy odds.
Dance

Curated by Tanusree Shankar and Sanjeev Bhargava, the dance programming for SAF 2017 expanded its focus from the previous edition to explore classical and contemporary dance forms in new and interpretive ways. The programming was an energetic and compelling blend of commissioned pieces featuring emerging talent, such as Purush, choreographed by Robert Moses Kin, as well as performances by luminaries in the field, including Astad Deboo, Aditi Mangaldas and Daksha Sheth. Important connections emerged, such as About the Elephant in collaboration with Sampad Arts and Heritage, UK and Shiv Yin: A Celebration of Life with Rukmini Chatterjee and The Beijing Contemporary Dance Company. In addition to this was an Expressive Movement Therapy workshop conducted by Tripura Kashyap as part of a special interactive workshop.

The central inspiration behind Purush, a curated piece with only male performers, is that the sheer volume of the male experience is yet to be addressed in a way that draws knowledge from the light and dark, the classical male and new male, the pressures, and joys of being a man. This work is a reach toward the unattainable, varied ever changing lived reality of every man in the world and ideals of a great many of the men in the audience.

Choreographer’s Note

I have struggled with finding just the right way to talk about art and creation for a long time. What I know is this: There is as much truth in movement as in speech, as much in life, and being a man in today’s world, as there is in living well any society and living well and fully must be about authenticity of action and ethic. That is what being a man is about. This work is formed from the literal blood and sweat of the men, the artists involved. They have been more than generous in sharing their life experiences, good will creativity, energy and knowledge they have been without a doubt the fuel in the engine that drives this work. The gossamer inspiration for the work however came from women of depth, charm and a great deal of drive. The central idea is that the sheer volume of the male experience is yet to be addressed in a way that draws knowledge from the light and dark, the classical male and new male, the pressures, and joys of being a man. This work is a reach toward the unattainable, varied ever changing lived reality of every man in the world and ideals of a great many of the men in the audience. This is for you and your sons, your wife and daughters, you fathers and ancestors. We are here only starting the conversation with a short statement but keep listening there is more to say and our live speak volumes.

Sari: The Unstitched

Sari: The Unstitched is a celebration of the creation of this unique drape in constant play with the body, both in stillness and in movement. This show was conceived to rekindle the lost playfulness and individuality of the sari. As the quintessential expression of the weavers’ imagination, talent and skill, the sari continues to be the jewel of the Indian handloom industry. This union of the sari and the wearer exudes the sensuality of dance. The performance highlights the stages in the journey from cotton pod to magnificent fabric, draped in a range of styles. ‘Sari’ was initiated and inspired by Rta Kapur Chisti of ‘The Sari School’, co-author and editor of ‘Saris - Tradition and Beyond’, and produced by the Daksha Sheth Dance Company.
At the heart of Uncharted Seas is the search for the intangible – truth, beauty, love and freedom. Though the performance is separated into sections, the production in its entirety attempts to capture the essence of the ‘search’, through the use of light, movement, space and rhythm, culminating in poetry in motion.

About the Elephant is an exploration of our place and purpose within civilization. The work draws upon our awareness and control of the information fed to us by higher powers. It is a physical expression inspired by recent and historical events that have affected our society’s perception of true reality. It is just as much a public protest as it is an intimate conversation. Playful yet thought provoking, About the Elephant is a search for clarity within our existence.
An extension of last year’s project, Sandhi included renowned musicians accompanied by four dancers. From each of these creative collaborations between a classical dancer and a classical vocalist emerge new productions that respond to a selected text.

Prekshana literally means ‘to see’, ‘to observe’. By extension, Antar-Prekshana is inner as well as inter-art observation, an engagement between dancer and musician, the presence of one inspiring the other in newer ways of interpreting their individual art forms.

Antar-Prekshana is a production with an unusual repertoire that combines various Hindustani musical forms like dhrupad, khayal, thumri, chaturang and tarana with the intra-forms of Odissi dance, thereby creating content that is novel and distinct as well as synthetic and coherent. therefore, do not work in isolation but rather engage in active interaction and exchange, resulting in a synthesized as well as coherent work of art.

Adhyatma
A collaboration of Carnatic music and Bharatanatyam

Music composition and Vocals: Sikkil Gurucharan
Indian Cello: Saskia De Haas
Indian percussion: Sumesh Narayanan
Academic support: Prof David Shulman

Adhyatma or the metaphysical, is a branch of Annamacharya’s works which deals with addressing the philosophical nature of the human mind. The poet here questions his own beliefs and his nature of existence, as also all of ours. Aranyani came across these padams in her reading as far back as 2012, in a book titled ‘God on the Hill’ by David Shulman and Narayana Rao, and when the chance to collaborate with Sikkil Gurucharan was provided by Serendipity Arts Festival, it provided the perfect opportunity to explore these metaphysical padams.

Aranyani selected 3 padams one that addresses the question of endlessness of the mind, another which questions the materialistic and unrealistic desires of humankind, and a final one that depicts the poet questioning his own actions and decisions about life. SAF 2017 was the very first time these padams have ever been performed or danced in recent performing arts history.

She questions the throne – the unshaken, historical symbol of power.

With half her life passed, Chitrangada, reflects upon her duties as the Queen of Manipur, wife of Arjuna and mother of Babruvahana. Reliving the crucial moments of her life, she raises questions that were left unheard.

“You are the throne-inanimate
Yet, you hold kings and other noblemen as puppets on a string!
You have caused violence, bloodshed, and war
Millions of innocent lives lost in your quest
To keep you, my father raised me like a man
To keep you, I let go of the man I loved
You made me choose: to be a wife or a mother?
I could have been both, but you made me take sides
I know now, the price of power is not paid at once,
It manifests as sacrifices throughout life.
I sit on you as a Queen, living on the power you exude–
But ultimately, it is you who has ruled me all my life.
Enough now, this must stop.
I have played my roles well enough
It is time now to live for myself, as myself–
To live as Chitrangada!”

Dancing Emptiness
A collaboration of Hindustani classical music and Kathak

Accompanists:
Yogesh Gangani (Tabla), Aashish Gangani (Pakhawaj), Abhishek Shinkar (Harmonium), Mohd. Nasir Khan (Accompanying Vocals), Roopak Chaudhari (Sound Design), Govind Singh Yadav (Light Design)

The term “emptiness” itself can easily conjure up the image of a state of nothingness, hopelessness or the simple absence of everything. But when Buddha speaks of emptiness, when Kabir talks about Shunya does it mean nothingness or hopelessness.

Emptiness includes the teaching of impermanence; everything is always in a state of change. Basically, things are constantly changing and deeply interdependent.

The dharma of non-attachment relates to the concept of emptiness and impermanence, since if all things are impermanent and are always changing, what is there to be attached to?

Is there a love without attachment?.. Is there a permanent beloved in the sea of impermanence?
Can “Emptiness” be danced? Can it be rejoiced?
“Dancing Emptiness” by Gauri Diwakar is an exploration of impermanence and unending interdependence of all. At “Dancing Emptiness” Buddha and Kabir meet to tell the story of love without attachment, rejoicement without indulgence.

Shiv Yin is a rare performance bringing China and India together through dance and music.

It is a beautiful love story that traverses the emotions of love, anger, jealousy and ultimate union, through a vibrant interpretation of classical Indian and contemporary Chinese dance forms. It explores the concept of the Male and the Female/ Yin and Yang through two distinct cultures.

In a larger context, Shiv Yin searches for commonalities between two great civilizations.
This workshop explores the uniqueness and dynamism of our inner dance and self-expression. Through therapeutic movement-based techniques, participants engage deeply with self-identity, the craft of movement and hence enhance intrapersonal integration. It is through this heightened sense of self that we become empowered enough to reach out to others. The workshop uses body preparation exercises, creative movement sequences to music, guided dialogues, dance studies and movement relaxation techniques, to strengthen the body-mind connection and the capacity for effective expression and communication. This creative-therapeutic-expressive movement process suits a wide range of personalities and body types.

With their enhanced creativity, problem-solving skills, and renewed capacity for introspection and exploration, participants emerge equipped for resonant and fruitful daily interactions, as well as the ability to use movement activities and games with other groups of children, adolescents, adults and the elderly.
Culinary Arts

Moving away from the idea of food as sustenance alone, culinary arts curators Odette Mascarenhas and Manu Chandra took a closer look at food as an art form through curated food stalls and workshops, with a focus on local produce and regional flavours. Odette Mascarenhas focused on the coconut as an integral element to many Goan dishes, allowing local establishments to showcase delectable traditional and contemporary dishes highlighting this ingredient. The festival also explored food and the experience of eating as something which is playful, engaging and magical through collaborations with the Center for Genomic Gastronomy, Mason & Co., Fratelli Wines, as well as workshops conducted by established chefs such as Aditya Raghavan, Vicky Ratnani and Sarah Todd.

‘Eating in the anthropocene’ is a 90-minute eating experience where visitors are introduced to the concept of the anthropocene: that human activities are so extensive we are leaving a geological record. Through four courses, visitors will experience concepts and flavours for eating in a new way, one which not only minimizes our impact on the planet, but actively attempts to heal it. The experience begins with the question of what our environment tastes like. What are the flavour properties of our polluted land, air and water? Then we look back at some of the ways we got to this point, via chemistry and the green revolution. We re-look at the value of cover crops and imagine how our agriculture could be not only harmless but also restorative. Finally, we ask the question of what our own bodies taste like to the other organisms that consume small parts of us every day, and all of us when we die. We put our bodies back into the planetary agro-ecosystem.
In what ways has the use of the coconut in cooking become popular beyond the western and southern coastlines of India? And how do those cuisines delve into and enhance its unique properties? The focus of cooking with coconut should be on playing with the senses: color, taste (texture, spice quotient), aroma (use of ingredients and methodology), and sound (even the crunch of a bite). With the diversity of cuisines across the length and breadth of India and the different methodologies that come into play in its various preparations, the coconut is infinitely versatile. The jugalbandi, or interplay, in the choice of preparations here is evident in each dish, which has its own unique story and art form.

The menus curated by Odette Mascarenhas for Serendipity Arts Festival 2017 are inspired by the coconut as both food and art form.
Stand on the Street

By Aruna Ganesh Ram

Four performers recreate life moments of various street vendors, framing the street as a performance space, sharing personal narratives, conversations around food and their aspirations. The audience journeys from one crafted space into another, in promenade style, encountering a new space and a new story, one after the other. The confluence of song, narrative, and rhythm will heighten the audience senses as ubiquitous street food becomes fascinating when one learns of the labour and love for food, hand-cooked, hand-served. The performance questions the audience’s relationship with street food and enable discoveries while bringing back fond memories of the times spent on the street.
This pop-up food cart serves different brinjal varieties and dishes during each day of the festival, celebrating the agricultural biodiversity of the Indian brinjal (also known as eggplant/aubergine). Each of these brinjals has a different flavour, texture and collection of recipes associated with it. Recipes are technological ecosystems, connecting certain ingredients and methods of preparation to certain flavours and varieties of plants. The Brinjal Taste-test celebrates the diversity of this versatile fruit which is such an integral part of Indian cuisine.

Through interactive, guided tastings of gourmet chocolate made with beans from India, Honduras, Bolivia, and Vietnam, these sessions will turn dark chocolate lovers into cocoa connoisseurs.

Visual Arts

Curated by Ranjit Hoskote and Riyas Komu, the visual arts programming at SAF 2017 aimed to look at the past, present and future of the arts in the South-Asian subcontinent, in a contemporary as well as an archival context. While Riyas Komu’s Young Subcontinent was a platform for young cultural activists from South-Asian countries to showcase their work produced under the curator’s mentorship, Ranjit Hoskote’s Anti Memoirs: Locus, Language, Landscape looked at artists from the colonial, postcolonial and contemporary eras addressing the challenge of a ‘present’ that is always saturated in its past. In addition to this, the visual arts spectrum included guest curators and artists whose work represents innovation in art forms, mediums, and display, in an attempt to redefine the manner and spaces in which art is accessed. This included street art, public art, interactive art installations, and a special show that included Goan artistic traditions and the local art community.

They tell us that we have a single past, a past painted in one colour. They tell us that we have a single future, a future painted in one colour. But the present troubles and perplexes them. Because the present refuses to be painted in the one colour of which they approve. It resists being constrained into dogma. It rejects the one-way street of ideology. The present, especially in India, is a crucible where many pasts spark together, are reshaped, and allow for the articulation of plural futures.

How do our artists address the rich challenge posed by these many pasts? How do they work with, celebrate, and renew memories that are embodied in the vigorous inheritances of artisanal lineage, poetic idiom, livelihood, folk wisdom, urban legend, pilgrim testimony, rite of passage, print modernity, the stylisation of place in image, poetry and song? Memory, in this context, is not reducible to simple memoiristic remembrance or anecdotal recalling. Rather, it is an urgent form of recollection that may be figured as premonition, prognosis or agency. It is an act of looking back to look forward – closely akin to Walter Benjamin’s conception of history, which he sees as a memory to be seized, as it flashes up at a moment of danger.

The Anti-Memoirs, the title of this exhibition is taken from the legendary 1967 book by the writer, soldier, diplomat and politician André Malraux, which traverses his 1965 journey to the East: to Egypt, India, China, and South-east Asia. Of this work, Malraux wrote: “I have called this book Anti-Memoire because it answers a question which memoirs do not pose and does not answer those which they do.” As the critic Roger Shattuck observes, Anti-Memoirs is not concerned with “events exclusively but with a particular relation between them: privileged moments”. In this spirit, the exhibition will essay a creative autobiography of contemporary India, by transverse means.
Facilitated by Serendipity Arts Foundation, this holistic and thematic residency was based equally in theory and practice, allowing the artists to create and collaborate with a group of their peers, and to connect with the community at large. For 2017, taking inspiration from the idea of ‘The Self in Self-Sufficiency’, Dharti provided a platform for creative sustainable development where the art, the artist and the community co-exist and foster connections across a wide spectrum of people and networks. Artists-in-residence were encouraged to engage in a dialogue with their locality, and incorporate their experiences towards both process and outcome, which is what is on display here. As a first attempt at a residency, was as much of an experiment as it was a learning curve. Building on the diversity of backgrounds of the six artists-in-residence, the works showcased here range from the intimate to the conceptual, as each artist has grappled with the ideas of identity, belonging and autonomy in a fast-changing urban environment.

The Young Subcontinent is a long term curatorial project that intends to bring young artists from India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, Nepal, Bhutan, Afghanistan, Myanmar and Maldives in conversation with each other to self reflexively engage with their histories and with contemporary hostilities within them. Shaped and settled over and over by waves of inward and outward migrations through centuries, the Indian subcontinent’s culture continues to hold together great diversities in its language, ethnicity, faith, food, lifestyle, and art forms, all of which meld into and influence each other. Despite such a long history of cohesion and fusion, the contemporary cultural landscape of the South Asian subcontinent is restive, often brimming with tensions that have civilizational, colonial and political dimensions and undercurrents. Decades after the separations and partitions imposed by the colonial encounter, the Young Subcontinent project seeks to challenge such divisive imaginaries and to explore and reassert the ‘tangles of our common roots’, and to create capacities to relate to the ‘othered’ cultures. Young Subcontinent aims to catalyze channels through which the continuum of intellectual and material cultures within this geography can be reestablished and reinforced through re-imaging and re-imagining.

During the last cycle, several artists and intellectuals from the different countries of the Indian subcontinent came together at Serendipity Arts Festival to exhibit their multi-disciplinary works, opening up questions that grip cultural production and practice in the subcontinent today. What are the potential ways in which art can undermine monolithic imaginaries, by excavating, celebrating and staging the nuances and subtleties of one’s complex heritage and tangled histories? What are the languages through which the ethics of operating in a complex and globalizing political economy be articulated? How does one work one’s way through the asymmetries within the art historical narratives of the subcontinent? Lastly, how can we deal with a civilizational memory that requires both remembering and forgetting, mourning and forgiving? Many of these questions resurface as we cross internal and external borders in order to navigate new landscapes and shifting tectonics of art and culture.

This project has a multi-pronged method of research, travel and exhibition as a way of productively engaging with art that opens windows to see/a new horizons of cultural mediations and trajectories of belonging with/to each other. The cross border journeys in search of new artists collapses the artist/curator divide into a mode of mentorship, triggering new creative processes on both sides. Adoption of such a non-conforming position has often helped artists to share their inner concerns, releasing the tension between the intellectual and the experiential, thought and action. While issues of infrastructure and patronage in the arts continue to dominate the artists in the subcontinent, the project is sensitive to the young artists’ search for promising platforms and opportunities to express their concerns. Through the generous support of the Serendipity Arts Foundation, the Young Subcontinent project aims to build a platform, a framework for vibrant and open discussions to take place. We foresee new friendships, partnerships and collaborations among young artists from the subcontinent as the future.
This project consists of a variety of street-art interventions, including larger-than-life billboard-style cutouts, murals, and sign paintings. It aims to look at Goa from individual perspectives of different creative personalities, and their combined effect when revealed in the urban landscape.

Mapusa Market is a microcosm of something much larger. As a space that accommodates everything from locally grown pumpkins and hand-crafted products to imported wines and Chinese electronics, it bears a network of relationships with places both close by and far flung—reflecting Goa’s unique history as well as its place in the modern world.

On being invited by Goa University to join as Mario Miranda Visiting Research Professor in Visual Art in 2013, I initiated a series of artistic explorations of the municipal market located in the heart of town—bringing on board students, teachers, and interested members of the general public in and around Mapusa.

Places like Mapusa Market possess dimensions that extend beyond their geographies. As storehouses of material culture, history, folklore, and lived experience, they not only reflect the identities of their inhabitants, but also help give shape to a local ethos. At the same time, visitors from elsewhere enter these places for work and leisure and contribute to the mix. We have been looking at the ways in which Mapusa Market produces identity, and how people within and outside the market relate to it. What makes one a ‘Mapshekar’? Does one have to be ‘from’ this place in order to claim it?

As Mapusa Market grows increasingly crowded, contested, and dysfunctional, the city authorities’ planning and policy solutions arise too often out of purely knee-jerk reactions, or for short-term economic and political benefits. Through our project, we are attempting to introduce new lenses with which to view the Market and hope to make visible the complex, often overlooked connections between places and people, and reveal how fragile these links are.
From the very beginning, the artists of Goa have contributed disproportionately to what is now recognized as modern and contemporary Indian art. The very first classes at JJ School of Art in colonial Bombay of the 1860s were filled with students from the Estado da India. In 1870, its director boasted about the extraordinary proficiency of his ‘Goanese’ pupils. Later, its star ‘native’ faculty member was António Xavier Trindade, who was also the first Indian to win the gold medal at the annual competition of the Bombay Art Society.

That prizewinning 1920 painting can be viewed just a short walk away from this exhibition, in the public gallery space of the Fundação Oriente. ‘Flora’ is a landmark achievement not only because a son of the Konkan painted so marvellously in the European style, but because of the audacity and panache with which the subject is portrayed. This is the artist’s own wife, depicted in a manner quite unlike what you might imagine an Indian woman of the times might consider suitable.

Similar paradigm-shifting and genre-bending has remained a hallmark of the art and artists of Goa, from the spectacularly beautiful sari-clad Madonnas of Angelo da Fonseca to the considered iconoclasm of Francis Newton Souza and Vasudeo Gaitonde in the Progressive Artist’s Movement of the late 1940s and early 1950s. But even as these geniuses emerged one after another from the cultural milieu of this tiny riparian sliver of the Konkan coastline, their powerful bonds and relationships to each other, and to the complex many-layered culture of their homeland has remained obscured, and barely acknowledged. Their collective profound influence on the supremely skilled artists who have continued to rise unstoppably from Goa is even less understood, and often flatly denied.

Now You See It: The Invisible River of Konkani Surrealism is a collaborative effort, and collective labour of love that makes a compelling argument for the Goan artistic world view. About the highly evolved built heritage of the state, the late architectural historian (who was partly responsible for bringing the Trindade archive to rest in Fontainhas) Paulo Varela Gomes wrote, it is not “the end-result of a compromise, but the affirmative artistic statement of a cultural position.” This certainly applies to the artworks in this wide-ranging exhibition showcasing the output of three generations of marvellous practitioners, who together make the case for Konkani Surrealism.

Precisely ten years ago, Ranjit Hoskote first made a sophisticated case for the art and artists of Goa to be recognized as a coherent whole, an ‘invisible river’ which “has fed into the wider flow of Indian art but has not always been recognised as so doing.” With their dedicated efforts in Now You See It, the artists of Goa have insisted on that acknowledgement, which can no longer be denied.

The Ground Beneath My Feet is an exhibition of cutting-edge performance art by artists from around the world.

Situated on a barge docked on Captain of Port Jetty on the Mandovi river in Goa, the exhibition explores the rapidly transforming relationship of human bodies with their natural environments and technological infrastructures.

Barges in Goa transport large cargo of iron ore and minerals across inland waterways and ports as far as the Arabian Sea. As fragments of landscapes... and bodies hauled along the swelling rivers and rising seas, the performance artworks and barge that come together in this exhibition pose to us the question: what is the ground beneath our feet?

The performance artworks in the exhibition are unique pieces composed and executed live, in-situ, by each artist.

The Ground Beneath My Feet is part of ‘After Event: Performance Art and Its Mediations’, a collaboration between Serendipity Arts Foundation, HH Art Spaces, and Asia Art Archive in India.

HH Art Spaces

HH Art Spaces is an artist-run residency space established in October 2014 in Siolim, Goa by Romain Loustau, Madhavi Gore and Nikhil Chopra. It is part of a movement of artists from the big cities to Goa, as an environment that offers space, time, an international community and an increasingly critical audience. The program focuses primarily on live art and performance with a strong emphasis on interdisciplinary and collaborative works. HH Art Spaces is a place for reflection, inspiration and creation; a place where artists come together, make and share their ideas, processes, experiments and collaborative efforts with one another and the community. Through the overlapping and interweaving of different practices and disciplines there is an inherent desire to create new languages and ways of making and receiving art. Every residency term ends with an OPEN Studio, when the house and gardens are transformed into a public exhibition to connect us with the larger community of Goa.

Asia Art Archive India

Asia Art Archive (AAA) is an independent non-profit organisation initiated in 2000 in response to the urgent need to document and make accessible the multiple recent histories of art in the region. With one of the most valuable collections of material on art freely available from its website and onsite library, AAA builds tools and communities to collectively expand knowledge through research, residency, and educational programmes. AAA in India (AAA in I) was established in 2013 reflecting the organisation’s widening scope of activities in India. With an on-site digital collection housed in New Delhi in a space that is open to visitors, AAA in I organises a range of projects, workshops, and programmes with a mission to build archives and instigate dialogue and critical thinking around contemporary art from India. The organization works in partnership with various individuals, organisations and institutions in the field that share AAA’s values.
A selection of films that explore and excavate various layers of contemporary life—personal experiences and dreams, social dilemmas and conflicts, and confrontations with tradition and modernity. The selection showcases the work of young directors from China, Singapore, Indonesia, Bangladesh, and India.

We could tell the story of the past seventy years of post-colonial urbaneity and modernization in our part of the world via an archaeology of the trash it has produced. There is an overwhelming, unstoppable material presence that has overtaken our cities with garbage, trash, debris, and detritus circulating alongside the transnational flow of goods, people, capital, images, and data that many anthropologists and scholars consider constitutive of globalization.

This exhibition is not a thematic exercise in representing the issue of waste in India, but rather exploring garbage as a palimpsest, a layered artefact subject to a multiplicity of interventions and interpretations. The term ‘detritus’ in this sense, is defined as waste and dead matter derived from the grazing food chain. The energy contained in detritus is not lost to the ecosystem as a whole, but serves as the source of energy. In a process of constant transformation, detritus produces its own aesthetics and generative afterlives.

This exhibition looks at some critical explorations by artists around the theme of waste produced over the past decade, and engages with its material, literal, ecological, social, political, and symbolic aspects. Working with ‘poor resources’, the artists present the gathering of precarious materials, and this act of recycling, as a powerful alternative model. These marginalized, unfashionable materials take centrestage—they rise and speak in different tongues and force us to acknowledge their presence.

Using the anthropologist Mary Douglas’s famous statement that “dirt is matter out place,” this exhibition also looks at the displacements that occur when artists work with the aesthetics of waste, foreground its materials and politics, and turn it into figures of radical indeterminacy. Detritus that refuses to fall into place, and refuse that refuses to be disposed, can thereby destabilise hegemonic orders.

The found object, in the tradition of the readymade, is given centre stage—culled from the everyday, the domestic, the industrial—to speak of bodily existence, totalitarian structures, systems of production, spaces of transcendence, and equally, subversion, taxonomies of terror and violence. Turned into coded signs, couched in the everyday, these objects pull in different directions towards the erotic, the therapeutic, the divine, the vulnerable, and the marginal.

They ask for different kinds of attention, standing in for the lives, processes and relationships that they extend from.

This exhibition explores notions of waste and value as products of cultural systems of structuring and signification, garbage as abandonment, ruination, and excess. Lastly, it asks us to consider the political realities of the communities that spend their lives immersed in cleaning and recycling this waste endlessly—the ultimate unacknowledged warriors.
Recognized for using cutting-edge technologies to tell both fictional and news-based stories that create immersive, empathic engagement on the part of viewers, Nonny de la Peña draws from the Asia Art Archive collection to create a new iteration of Safely Maneuvering Across Lin He Road (1995) by New York and Beijing based artist Lin Yilin.

In the initial performance, Lin built a wall of bricks in the middle of a busy roadway in Guangzhou. As the artist moved across, he gradually brought the wall along, forcing cars to detour around him. For Passage: The Life of a Wall on Lin He Road, de la Peña recreates the environment of Guangzhou in the 1990s through an immersive virtual reality experience where participants take on Lin’s role as roadside artist.

Lin’s conceptual practice often embraces sculpture, installation, photography, and moving-image media that feature outdoor performances involving architectural and urban construction motifs; and he shares a mutual interest in issues affecting changing urban city life with de la Peña. Using digital technology, de la Peña does not simply re-enact Lin’s performance but creates an experiential encounter that pushes boundaries: between artist as maker, audience as receiver, and art as conceptual or visceral.

Nonny de la Peña is known for her work as “The Godmother of Virtual Reality,” co-founding Emblematic Group in the United States.

Lin Yilin lives and works in New York and Beijing. He co-founded the artist group ‘Big Tail Elephants’ in 1990. This project was first presented by Asia Art Archive at Art Basel in Hong Kong 2017 as part of 15 Invitations for 15 Years, marking Asia Art Archive’s 15-year anniversary. The creation of this project was supported by Lavina & William Lim and is brought to India for the first time with the support of Serendipity Arts Foundation.
Last year, I walked into the office of Dr. Annamalai, the director of the National Gandhi Museum in New Delhi. Tushar Gandhi, the great grandson of the Mahatma, had spoken to him about my ongoing “Fir Gandhi” project, which involves artists from India and around the world engaging with the Mahatma in their works. Dr. Annamalai then produced Gandhi’s original medical file, which, apart from a number of blood and urine reports, contained a few original electrocardiograms of the man called the Father of the Nation. As a doctor fascinated with the intersections of biology and physics, I was thrilled to discover that I could actually convert the ECGs into a sonic rendering of what Gandhiji’s heart might have sounded like.

When you walk into “Bapu Kuti” structure, you will hear the sounds of Gandhi’s heart as you watch an animated sculpture expressing his faint, compassionate smile. The electrocardiogram itself is displayed on one wall, while the other is adorned with the story of mirrors neurons, elements in the brain responsible for universal empathy, which the neuroscientist V. S. Ramachandran aptly termed “Gandhi Neurons.”

With the help of Ukrainian computer engineer Dmytro Dokunov, we have also documented a number of sculptures of Mahatma Gandhi from across the country in 3D, which visitors can access by downloading the free Gandhi AR app from the Google Play store. When the phone, with the app open, is pointed at the unique codes displayed on the wall, the correspondent virtual sculptures will appear.

On a podium across the “Bapu Kuti” hut lies a composition of blue laterite stones along with a sculpture of Gandhi created by Navso Parwar. This installation celebrates 100 years since the Mahatma’s first Satyagraha (nonviolent resistance) on Indian soil, in support of the farmers of Champaran, Bihar, who were forced to grow indigo on their land and consequently extorted by the British.

Photography curators Dinesh Khanna and Prashant Panjiar addressed experimentation within photography in 2017; they challenged traditional notions of display and ways of viewing, looking at both archival and contemporary photographic practices. The focus was on interdisciplinarity in photography, with projects addressing a myriad of topics ranging from environmentalism like Arati Kumar-Rao’s show A Slow Violence: Stories from the Largest River Basin in the World to the history of Indian jazz, brought alive through Prashant Panjiar’s The Music Stopped, But We Were Still Dancing...

This discipline also included collaborative shows with eminent people and institutions from the field, which expanded photography to include discourses on film, photobooks, and projection as a relevant photographic medium.

Slow-violence is neither spectacular nor instantaneous, and is borne by people away from the glare of graphic media and loud news-cycles. The social fallouts of environmental degradation, for example, is a slow-violence: it unfolds in temporal timescales, its true implication manifesting over several generations and, often, in places far removed from the trigger points.

An appetite for graphic news means that these slow-burn stories often go underreported. To address this shortcoming, Arati takes a longitudinal view. She returns to places, tracking the lives of landscapes, people, issues over time.

India is drastically re-engineering her rivers with irreversible impacts on ecosystems and communities. Adding fuel to this slow violence of environmental degradation are the wildcard vagaries of climate change. Taken together, they are wreaking havoc on communities and creatures that live by and depend upon India’s rivers and forests.

Arati criss-crosses the region documenting — through words, images, and infographics — the changing lives of landscapes and communities. This exhibition is a slice of ongoing work in the largest river basin in the world: the Ganga-Brahmaputra basin.

“I don’t try to fool myself that stories of individuals are themselves arguments. I just believe that better arguments, maybe even better policies, get formulated when we know more about ordinary lives.”

- Katherine Boo
Navtej Singh has always been drawn to the soul of India’s vast coastal regions, and the variegated populations that draw life from it. Having spent a large part of his life in the Konkan Coast, Gujarat, Tamil Nadu, and the Andaman and Nicobar Islands, he presents a unique vantage point into the natural life and communities dwelling in and around these spectacular and immense waters. The photographs deftly capture movement and paradox: the natural path of migratory birds against the daily motions of trawlers and fishing boats, or the almost-eternal stillness of the ocean against the bustling fish markets of port cities. Singh looks for messages in all his subjects, whether living or inanimate, and pieces together a fascinating visual narrative of the minutiae of coastal economies that is both insightful as well as hypnotic to look at. His magnificent images ambitiously seek to immortalize ceaselessly evolving areas, where human beings have for centuries intersected—and often been in conflict with—with their aquatic surroundings.
For Anup Shah, growing up on the precipice of the Maasai Mara in Kenya, to end up photographing elephant herds striding across the plains or lions hidden in the grass waiting for prey, seemed almost inevitable. Since his childhood, Shah has been drawn to the giddy feeling of freedom and boundless exuberance in the wildlife just beyond the walls that contained him, and has been on a mission to capture that feeling through his images ever since.

In the breathtaking photographs on display here—a selection from his book, The Mara, published by the Natural History Museum in London—Shah subverts the conventional expectations of bright, colorful animal imagery. He chooses instead to use a dramatic grayscale palette to harness light, texture, and movement in their most epic forms. To experience these works is to bear witness to the beauty and reality of the Savannah: an almost infinite sky and rolling landscape, punctuated by the rhythms of life, death, and survival of its inhabitants.

Shah’s work actively pushes the boundaries of wildlife photography, acting not only as passive observer but also bringing its viewers into intimate spaces—solitude, rest, migration—with thoughtfulness. In a moment when the chasm between nature and humanity seems ever-widening, these images create an opportunity for empathy and renewed wonder.
Exploring Panjim’s Secrets

Curator Dinesh Khanna
Photographers Assavri Kulkarni and Manish Jaju

This project focuses on the city of Panjim, and its unexplored secrets in the form of short photo essays in a newsletter. A photographer native to Goa and another who has made Goa his home shall photograph select stories/spaces in the city which are often overlooked, but are spaces and happenings that add a unique character to the city. The newsletter is a special photo-project in its own right, and will be circulated at different venues at the time of the Festival.
On Valentine’s Day in 1919, the Times of India issued a dire warning about an American phenomenon that was sweeping the world. Jazz bands, the newspaper predicted, would ‘make life a nightmare’ because they had only one objective: ‘to produce as much noise as possible’. Months later, the commotion slammed into the subcontinent. Indians, to the horror of the snobs, sprang to their feet to dance.

The fox trotting, jitterbugging and jiving continued for almost four decades. From around 1925 to 1965, jazz and its elder sibling, ‘hot’ dance music, held the subcontinent in thrall. From hotel stages in Peshawar and public bandstands in Madras, from the podiums of gymkhanas in Rajkot and railway institutes in Jamalpur, immaculately dressed... musicians belted out fascinating rhythms that instantly had their audiences hooked. Upon hearing a pioneering jazz band at the Taj in Bombay, one young man seemed to articulate India's reactions to the swinging tunes when he confessed: “The music went to my head.”

As it turns out, Goan musicians played a vital role in conjuring up that magic. Coming from a territory with a long familiarity with Western music, many Goans heard in jazz an echo of the songs of their souls. Their vast talents soon attracted the attention of composers of Hindi film music. Goan musicians were hired as arrangers to notate tunes that merged influences from both East and West, and also formed the bulk of the orchestras that recorded these melodies.

This exhibition draws on the personal photograph albums of around a dozen families to recreate together a vivid portrait of the significant Goan band leaders of India’s jazz age.

The exhibition contains an add-on section presented by the AIIS – Archive and Research Centre for Ethnomusicology that uses interactive computer screens to tell the larger story of jazz in India, with photographs from the famous Jazz Yatras and dozens of rare recordings by Indian musicians.
UNSUNG: Celebrating the Extraordinary Grandeur of Smallness

Curators Mahesh Bhat & Dinesh Khanna

Photographs by: Aparna Mohindra, Deepti Asthana, Karen Dias, Neeraja D and Sharmistha Dutta

UNSUNG began in 2004 as a tribute to ordinary Indian citizens who have dedicated themselves to improving the lives of people around them. The first volume in the project, titled UNSUNG, was published as a response to our celebrity-led hero culture. It assumed the mantle of a catalyst for change when it helped raise over Rs. 9 million to the causes of the heroes we featured. Readers wrote to tell me how it inspired them.

The thoughts, words, and deeds of our heroes are always aligned. They say what they think and do what they say; the measure of success is their own. Without exception, each of these heroes shares these two qualities, and I think that has a big role to play in their achievements. There is something heroic about their convictions and their strength to stand by them. By their example, anyone can be a hero; one doesn’t need to create ripples in the world. Often, our heroes come in the form of friends and acquaintances who enter our lives, create a profound impact, and transform us. They bring about change by being a mirror to our thoughts and ideas. The second volume of UNSUNG is dedicated to these heroes—friends, relatives, and acquaintances who have transformed our lives. Their role is not to take us out of our depths of misery or offer us an escape route. As the American author Bernard Malamud put it “Without heroes we are all plain people and don’t know how far we can go.”

The second book in the series, UNSUNG: Extraordinary Lives, was published in 2016, and... features stories of seven heroes from across India. Some of the country’s top photographers including Amit Mehra, Dinesh Khanna, Jyothi Karat, Namas Bhojani, and Prashant Panjiar have collaborated with Mahesh Bhat to produce the book. Social scientist Amita Baviskar, Geshe Dorji Damdul, director of Tibet House- Cultural Center of H.H the Dalai Lama, activist Madhu Malhotra, journalists Saritha Rai, Radhika Bordia, and Sugata Srivasa Raju have also written essays. The great organic farmer Masanobu Fukuoka’s estate granted permission to use a chapter from his book The One-Straw Revolution in the second volume. The third volume of the UNSUNG project is this exhibition, “Celebrating the Extraordinary Grandeur of Smallness.”

Celebrating the Extraordinary Grandeur of Smallness

In the outer limit of ordinary perception lies the beauty of unseen lives. All it takes is attention and knowing how to look. Our oldest stories tell us about a time when all beings shared a common language, a language that has been long forgotten. In indigenous ways of knowing, we say that a thing cannot be understood until it is known by all four aspects of being: mind, body, emotion, and spirit. Humans are myopic creatures, we rely on technology to bring the vastness of the universe or the depths of our bodies into our visual sphere. We are often blind to the sparkling reality that is so close to us, not because our eyes cannot see, but because our mind cannot. We do not need technology to see these hidden worlds, only time, patience and attentiveness. Native American Cheyenne wisdom says that the best way to find something is to not go looking for it, but to watch out of the corner of your eye, open to possibility, and what you seek will be revealed. This revelation of suddenly seeing what one was blind to only moments before can be a sublime and humbling experience of the boundaries between our world and the world of another. The unseen is suddenly plain and a whole new world is revealed.

Our artists Aparna Mohindra, Deepti Asthana, Karen Dias, Neeraja D. and Sharmistha Dutta tell the stories of these unseen lives, places, and philosophies that inhabit the liminal boundaries between worlds. Working in Delhi, Dhanushkodi, the jungles of Ponmudi near Trivandrum, Bangalore, and Varanasi, these artists have looked at lives and places with attention and patience. We present here the possibilities of art to reveal more than the obvious; there are multiple stories in each image. As Neeraja says, if you turn that little stone on the field, a whole new ecosystem will be revealed. If we look and listen to their work, perhaps we will discover a new way of seeing life. Celebrating the Extraordinary Grandeur of Smallness derives inspiration from the writings of botanist Robin Wall Kimmerer’s book on mosses.
A Cinematic Imagination: Josef Wirsching and the Bombay Talkies

Curators Rahaab Allana and Debashree Mukherjee
Institutional Collaborators Alkazi Foundation for the Arts and The Wirsching Archive
Creative Collaborators Georg Wirsching
Scenography Sudeep Chaudhari

This exhibition tells a story of a world across worlds, a story of cultural convergence that brought together Berlin and Calcutta, Munich and Bombay. It draws from the photographic archive of Josef Wirsching, a German cinematographer who made India his workplace and home. Wirsching’s archive comprises behind-the-scenes photographs of cast and crew, production and publicity stills that give us unprecedented access to the aesthetic decisions and creative communities that were vital to filmmaking in late colonial India.

Indian artists, at the turn of the century, actively sought to forge an aesthetic language that could be simultaneously nationalist as well as modern. Frustrated with European academic canons and colonialist stereotypes, they turned to local artistic genealogies and avant-garde movements outside the British empire. Germany, with its long history of Indological enquiry, became an ally in this endeavor. Thus it is that Rabindranath Tagore visited Germany in the 1920s, and in turn, the Austrian art historian, Stella Kramrisch, joined Shantiniketan and organized a landmark Bauhaus exhibition in Calcutta (1922).

This two-way cultural exchange was keenly felt in the world of cinema; the success of “Oriental” films such as Sumurun (1920), The Tiger of Eschnapur (1921) and The Indian Tomb (1921) was met with the ambition of Indian filmmakers who approached German studios for technical training. Raja Ravi Varma had already popularized German chromolithographic techniques and European approaches to the body through his mass-produced calendar art. In the 1920s, intrepid nationalist filmmakers such as Dadasaheb Phalke, V Shantaram and Himansu Rai self-consciously reworked these influences with inspiration from German Oberammergau passion plays, Bengal School portraiture, Heimatfilm rural stories, Art Deco industrial design, and Hindustani classical musical conventions.
WW2 led to a different kind of exchange when Jewish exiles such as Walter Kaufmann and Willy Haas moved to Bombay and entered the local film scene. Bombay Talkies studio, inaugurated in 1934, embodied the cultural dynamism of the moment in its core team led by Himansu Rai, Franz Osten, Josef Wirsching, Nirajan Pal, and Devika Rani. BT played a foundational role in defining India’s commercial film form, producing some of the most iconic musical films of the era which foregrounded urgent issues of social reform. These films borrowed freely from East and West to create a new aesthetic that might be called “swadeshi modernism” - a heady pastiche that begs us to question easy notions of Indian and foreign, traditional and experimental.

Josef Wirsching’s artistic imagination infused Bombay cinema with the psychological depth and stylistic ethos of German Expressionism. At the same time, his photographic archive gestures towards another meaning of the “cinematic” – a term that is commonly used to describe moments in reality that seem elevated beyond the everyday. In these images we see the interaction of individuals, objects, and environments, framed by a vision that captures the beauty and drama beneath the surface of the laborious work of film production.
Photography and dance have always intersected in paradoxical ways: an ambitious immortalization of movement, where the fluid and continuous are captured within a static frame. How can a medium that seeks to suspend the flow of time and the corporeal be authentic to one that is determined by them? For photo-artist Dayanita Singh and choreographer Mark Morris, these apparent incongruities act as a platform to explore how still images and motion can interact.

Repurposing photographs from Singh’s 1994 series Master Ji, which depicts the legendary Bollywood choreographer Saroj Khan on-set and in her prime, Morris arranges a narrative of movement set against a hypnotic soundtrack of Carnatic music. In the exuberant grayscale images, Khan—often referred to as ‘masterji’ for her singular talent and dominance in Bollywood at the time—is seen tutoring colossal superstars of the ‘90s like Sanjay Dutt, Shah Rukh Khan, and Madhuri Dixit. Her almost-mythical presence in these photographs is made all the more surreal by the fantastical sets, glamorous costumes, and Morris’ anachronistic musical choice and corresponding timing of the photographs, creating a mesmeric balancing act between sound, vision, and imagined movement.

Morris, who since his first visit to India in 1981, has been enchanted by the complexity of Carnatic music in particular, curated the Sounds of India series, with a focus on South Indian forms, at the White Light Festival in New York City last year. His “choreography” of Singh’s images here, seen for the first time in India, forges a fascinating interplay of the classical and the commercial, stillness and kinetics, while keeping the formidable aura of Saroj Khan at its fore.
One of the many mini ‘museums’ contained within Dayanita Singh’s traveling Museum Bhavan project is the Museum of Chance, a sequence of photographs mixed with text, stills, and found images that together consider the nature of time and experience through the idea of chance.

The works are placed within wooden screen-like structures that can be unraveled and rearranged in a constantly shifting act of meaning-making, where viewers themselves begin to weave together patterns and connections. Museum of Chance becomes a manifestation of Singh’s notion of photo-architecture: its structural paradigms, resembling fortune itself, are immediately tangible and ultimately elusive.

Dayanita Singh’s Pocket Museum rejects the hierarchies its name might suggest. This is indeed a museum, but not the kind you’d expect. It is a deeply personal space, one where institutional structures of the gallery are brought into question against the individual viewer’s potential to curate idiosyncratic experiences of art.

Pocket Museum is seen here as a miniature version of a longer-running traveling project called Museum Bhavan, in which Singh’s photographs are placed inside folding wooden screens and are continually reconfigured.

In its book avatar however, Pocket Museum proffers an array of possibilities to its owners, who can arrange each of the nine volumes—which fold out like accordions—as they please. Each book (“Museum of Furniture” or “Little Ladies Museum” to name just two) contains a selection of black and white photographs spanning Singh’s eminent career, and are housed within boxes silk-screened and covered with achara fabric, making each package both mass-produced and completely unique.

By handing over an archive of her work for the viewer to reorganize, Singh softens the distinctions between the artist and observer, curator and spectator, inviting new forms of meaningful participation. Pocket Museum is an intimate celebration of ambiguity, an almost-blank canvas for a new kind of individual artistic experience.
Dayanita Singh’s photographs have always been synonymous with their bound forms. For much of her practice, Singh has been interested in the ways in which books can act as objects or catalogs, presenting alternate possibilities for experiencing images, and the imagined sequences or narratives in which they often exist. Her books are intimate explorations of the lives and places she depicts: the biographical and the mythic, combined with geographies inflected with her signature, poignant tone. On display here is a selection of covers spanning three decades of Singh’s oeuvre, including groundbreaking early works like Zakir Hussain (1986) and Myself Mona Ahmed (2001) to more recent projects like Dream Villa (2010) and File Room (2013).

To live in Kashmir is to live with its fractured narratives: the portrait of an idyllic paradise pitted against the reality of its daily conflict. So much has been written about the struggle for azadi (freedom), state oppression, militarization, insurgency, and the constant shadow of violence. In Witness/Kashmir 1986-2016, filmmaker Sanjay Kak, himself a Kashmiri, opts to cut out the cacophony and focuses instead on powerful, visual storytelling in the region, through the lenses of nine Kashmiri photojournalists. The pictures Kak compiles in this book, published earlier this year, document not only the brutal effects of war and geopolitical dispute but also the scale of lives that are framed against it. How does life carry on in such tumult? This book cannot offer answers, but does provide a glimpse—an opportunity to bear witness—to Kashmir’s complex realities.
Craft

A large part of the focus of the craft programme for SAF 2017, curated by Manjari Nirula and Annapurna Garimella looked at Goan craft and architecture as a long term engagement with the region through the Serendipity Barefoot School of Craft: Made in Goa. The Jaali project, curated by Manjari Nirula, aimed to show the creativity, dexterity and range of materials, techniques and regional hand skills still being practiced in India. They also showed how craftspeople are responding to new influences and contemporary lifestyles, while still retaining their own signature and ethos.

The Pano Bhaju: Influences & Inspirations
Curated by Wendell Rodricks

Adil Shah Palace

Artisanal skills cross materials, motifs, and influences. Over the centuries, techniques and traditions from Greece, Central Asia, Persia, Turkey and the Middle East, China and Europe, brought by invaders, traders, pilgrims, and travelers, have mingled with India’s own vibrant art forms and craftspeople. The flowing lines and motifs of one aesthetic, borrowing and integrating with the structured geometry of another; the classic realism of Western art melding with the stylised metaphysics of Buddhist and Hindu temple architecture, the naïf abstraction of tribal expression as a perfect counterpoint to contemporary art, all evolving organically to create a unique and distinctive Indian dynamic. The jaali is a recurring theme in architecture, interiors, and artifacts, repeating itself in stone, wood, plaster, fibre and weaving, even embroidery. It is a design response to the heat and dust of India, and the need for both light and shade, with cool breezes blowing through its apertures. Equally important is its play with darkness and light, and the skilful juxtaposition of negative and positive space: a perfect metaphor for the duality of existence central to Indian philosophy and art.

These collections aim to show the creativity, dexterity, and range of materials and techniques still being practiced in India. They also demonstrate how craftspeople are responding to new influences and contemporary lifestyles, while still retaining their own signature ethos.
Since its independence in 1961, Goa has seen tremendous social change with the massive migration of the Goan Portuguese, and the ebbing away of a variety of craft forms. The region has since become a destination for new interstate and international migrants, and industries such as tourism, real estate, and mining have created novel and tumultuous relationships with the land, its people, and its cultures. These changes in economy, identity, and patronage have led to the widespread belief that there is no noteworthy craft left in Goa.

The Barefoot School of Craft in Goa is an intervention which seeks to alter this perception by initiating a deep re-engagement with craft. This project stems from the knowledge that inherited crafts like baking, shell craft, lace tatting, Kunbi sari weaving, and shoemaking are still in practice. The project also accepts diverse incipient crafts such as ready-made clothing, studio pottery, jewellery, and tourist-shack construction. The Barefoot School further emerges from a commitment to the idea that we all need to become students and conscious learners in times when fundamental social structures are transforming.

The Barefoot School will be a space for learning, teaching, and marketing crafts, and will be built by the craftspeople of Goa with the assistance of architects, designers, and curators. The design for the school was developed through an open competition in which Indian and international architects were invited to submit proposals. In this exhibition, visitors see all the proposals and fifteen models of designs selected by a jury consisting of architect Aniket Bhagwat, crafts activist, educator, and anthropologist Judy Frater, Green Building Specialist at the International Finance Corporation Shruti Narayan, and Annapurna Garimella, an art historian and designer.

Submissions were asked to consider readily available materials and environmentally suitable architecture and be able to incorporate the range of craftspeople that Goa has. All submissions will be evaluated by visitors as well as Goan craftspeople. Their responses are important to the finalization of the design and its actualization in the future.

Developed collaboratively, The Barefoot School will seek to create a balance between vernacular and formalised design practices.

At the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th, Goa was connected by trade and a cultural osmosis to places long-established as early as the 16th century, by Portuguese sea routes on the West and East coasts of India.

The Pano Bhaju, also known as Torhop (or Thoddop) Baz or Fota Quimao, is a garment that appeared at the dawn of the 20th century, worn primarily in South Goa to dance the Goan Mando. Historians, ethnographic observers, and social documenters speak both derisively and glowingly about the Pano Bhaju. The ceremonial Torhop Baz worn during the Mando dance was made from velvet or silk, red, blue or green in colour, and embroidered with gold (rarely with silver threads). A white, yellow, or blue ‘fato’ stole was draped on the shoulder; the socks had to be white and the ‘chinello’ velvet mules embroidered in gold thread. The ensemble was graced with a fan, with elaborate, sparkling gold jewellery adorning the neck, ears, hands, and hair, which enhanced the beauty of the dancing lady.

While Goans look at this garment as quintessentially Goan, its history lies in multiple inspirations and modifications that were made to suit society at the time. The ensemble is an adaptation of many costumes: from the Far East, countries such as Malaysia, Indonesia, Philippines, Thailand, Burma, and China combined a sarong or lungi worn under a blouse to form the garment’s inspirational foundation. have their own versions of the sarong. Across the mountains, Persia, China, and Central Asia influenced the pattern pieces and embroidery motifs of the Pano Bhaju. Japan, on the Pacific edge, also provided motifs and gold thread to the garment, in addition to the white socks worn with a kimono, which also appear with the Goan costume.

Sourcing garments from these countries, designer Wendell Rodricks travels across the sea and the silk route to celebrate the complex history and influences that create one of Goa’s most iconic garments of the last century. Using photographs, illustrations, and interactive elements, he pieces together the history of a dramatic, richly adorned, and also humbly practical ensemble that washed across seas and land to India’s golden state.

"Art as a Catalyst for Change"

Closing conference for the Young Subcontinent project

A conversation between Riyas Komu (India), Dr. C.S. Venkiteswaran (India), Omaid Sharifi (Afghanistan), Thamothishram Sanaathanan (Sri Lanka) and Sangeeta Thapa (Nepal) moderated by Amrith Lal (Delhi, India).

This panel discussion brings together artists, cultural practitioners and ambassadors from the different nations of South Asia to find ways in which art making process can address, as well as draw from such political and social flux in the contemporary times.
With a focus on Indian art during the period 1700 - 1850, this year’s Conclave is an integral discursive feature of Serendipity Arts Festival. Curated by Christie’s, the conclave includes a number of prominent speakers—each with their own areas of research and ongoing work—to engage with themes around patronage and connoisseurship during the 18 – 19th Century, the varying art forms being produced during the time, the changing dynamics of political power, and the resultant increase in trade of the art forms with the advent of colonial rule.

Christie’s Conclave: “Indian Art from 1700-1850”
At Serendipity Arts Festival, we believe that art should be accessible to all. At SAF 2016, Siddhant Shah conceptualized Senses, which included not only art reproduced in braille, but also braille site maps and signage, as well as sensitization workshops along with curated walks for the less-abled. We were delighted to extend this programme as Senses 2.0 at SAF 2017.

List of Activities:
Chaap Choop block printing
Blind photography workshop
Hear and smell to paint
Curated walks + Activities

This year, the International Film Jury was headed by Barry John, a British born, Indian theatre director and teacher.

The Enriching Journey: From Grape to Glass

A special installation in collaboration with Fratelli Wines

Artist
Hemi Bawa

The idea behind The Enriching Journey, a project supported by Fratelli Wines, was to connect a popular drink back to its natural origins, and the roots of its process. This installation by sculptor and painter Hemi Bawa draws inspiration from the myriad ecosystems and mechanisms essential to the production of wine. Following the path of the grape from its cultivation to its ageing and ripening, Bawa is interested not merely in the final product, but in how this little fruit has sustained communities, economies, and landscapes for centuries, and how winemaking can offer a platform for natural transformation and positive impact. By reusing materials like bottles (blue and green, to mirror the water and plants of the vineyard) and iron, Bawa creates a mesmeric and tactile experience of what goes into producing this beloved, age-old beverage.
